

Inequalities in the National Health System (SNS) in Spain
Beatriz González López-Valcárcel
Patricia Barber Pérez
University of Las Palmas de GC

In the field of health inequalities that really matter are those that affect people. The territories are merely the physical substrate where they settle. But Spain has been taken before decentralization as an end in itself than as an instrument to achieve objectives in the field of health. In our health system is obvious tension between centralization and decentralization. The role of the Ministry of Health (MSC) has been reduced to take a residual. We need to regain the lead in building momentum strategies comprehensive system of health, national health policies and also for ensure the fairness of the system. In the field of inequalities, delimit the boundary between the tolerable and what is not a complex issue requiring a lot of rules of thumb whose answer is not clear from the evidence.